This paper proposes a novel trust model for assessing the trustworthiness of advice. It calculates the expectation of an advice’s outcome by assessing the probabilities of the advised plan being picked up and executed, and the goal being achieved. These probabilities are learned from an analysis of similar past experiences using tools such as semantic matching and action empowerment.